Summary: (machine translated)
Rappel canyon. Partly dry in between, unexpectedly scenic and beautiful.

Hydrology:

Access:

Approach: (machine translated)
From the junction, follow the slope in a zigzag down to the bottom (with 4x4 also possible to the entry). The first rappel is at the ford.

Tour: (machine translated)
The first two rappels begin beautifully incised with water, which then quickly disappears into the streambed. This is followed by a longer, dry walking passages. This is followed by more rappels, but this time with a deeper cut. Following a chute, which may have brackish water here, you then suddenly rappel into clear water that comes out of a semicircle into the basin. The further course is almost cave-like in places. The water is cold but crystal clear and you can usually downclimb the steps. However, you have to walk a little to get to the exit.

Return: (machine translated)
Various signs point the way to the large canyon at the exit. Now look for a dilapidated house on the left, behind which a whole path leads steeply upwards from tentative tracks to the parking lot.
