Summary: (machine translated)
rappel canyon

Hydrology: (machine translated)
After heavy rainfall and in the winter season.

Access: (machine translated)
To the parking lot at the chapel.

Approach: (machine translated)
At the chapel, a good path leads uphill, which you follow across the first streambed to the entry point. Here you will find a crumbling bench with a table.

Tour: (machine translated)
The first rappels begin immediately and the canyon follows several turns until you reach an old water pipe. An easy exit is still possible here. After that, the route continues in a heavily incised section. (We got out because the pools looked very unappetizing). However, the gulch is very attractive and is probably also used commercially more often in the winter months.

Dry canyon. There were a few pools filled with (muddy) water, not all of which could be bypassed. But if you’re in the area, it’s still worth the hike down. After crossing the trail over the stream, we climbed steeply up the thorny slope, just before the highway, and then followed the trail back to the car. Fortunately, there are several freely accessible hot springs in the area where you can wash up in the hot water after hiking through the canyon. (machine translated)

At this time of year, the canyon is dry at first, then there were some pools with acceptable water quality that you could bypass. Later, the pools were only brackish water, so we got out. (machine translated)
