Specialities:

Gear:

Summary: (machine translated)
Alpine canyon with two parts separated by a dam, the first part is more steep and the second part is more open and with long rappels that allow higher flows. Long and hard approach, with snow in its development until well into the summer, so we should do it at the end of summer or early autumn. For lovers of little known and remote descents.

Hydrology:

Access: (machine translated)
Take the N260 from Sabiñánigo to Biescas. We will continue straight on towards France on the A136 to Sallent de Gállego where we will park.

Approach: (machine translated)
We head to the pavilion and shortly before arriving there is a path on the right that goes up to the Pondiellos ravine, we will follow the path that runs parallel to the stream and goes to the Tebarray peak.
At an altitude of 1850m we can go along the path of Garmo de la Mina (to the right, orographic left of the stream) or to the left by the path over the Bco Tebarray. In both cases at about 2150m we could approach the riverbed to enter by the part of the dam (escape) or continue ascending by the orographic right until 2300m approx. moment in which we will throw ourselves to the right to the riverbed once surpassed the crack to descend. This point is very evident because it is an open area just before the crevasse.

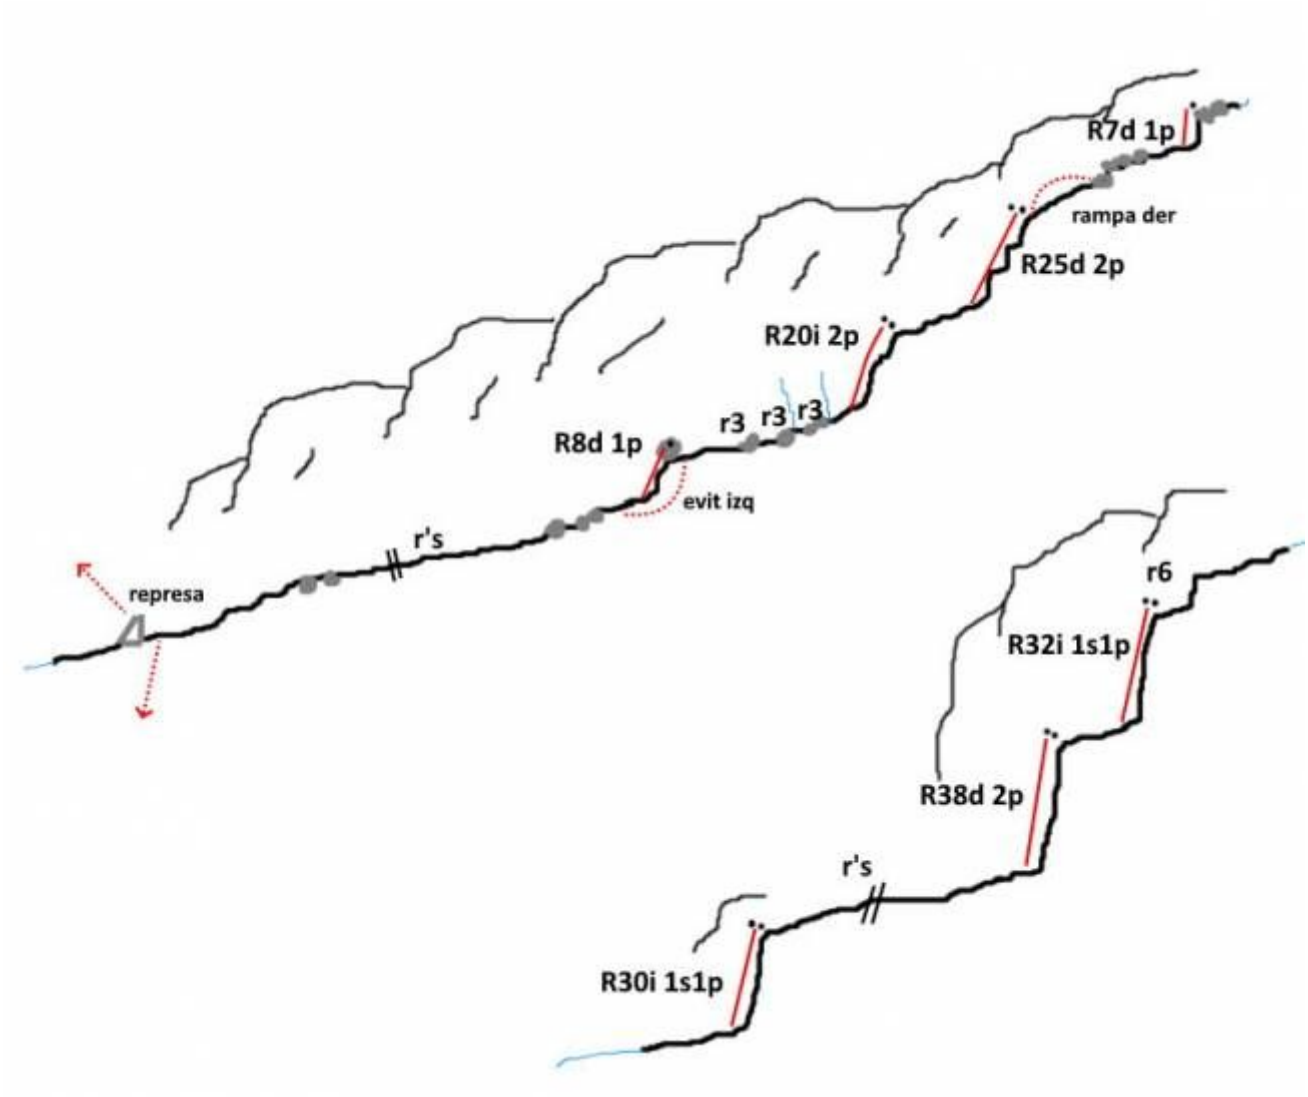

Tour: (machine translated)
We will enter the crevasse, with 3 rappels and several cliffs and ramps before a less vertical area of ledges that lead us to the dam, where the canyon opens up.
The second part starts here, much more open but with longer and more interesting rappels.

Return: (machine translated)
The ravine opens up after the last rappel and we will arrive at the place where the access "path" goes up.
